This gives people an opportunity to earn cash by selling their videos to such libraries. So, if you have skills for shooting videos, you can also cash in on the stock footage business.

While watching a certain part of a film or a show, have you ever felt that you have already watched it? Before tagging it as a strong deja vu feeling, you have to take a closer look as you might probably have seen it before. The video footage might have been taken from the stock footage gallery and used in different productions previously. Aerial shots, wildlife videos, festivities and certain other videos are used over and over again in a number of productions.

Stock footage is used over and over to save costs of production which can be extensively high depending on the project. From getting permit to shoot and arranging for equipment to hiring people and travelling, the cost varies based on a range of factors. specialists have been making big bucks by selling stock footage to various libraries for years. Recently, people with little experience with a semii consultant camera which can shoot in an HD resolution have also began to get in on the stock footage industry.

So, if you have the interest in videography, the talent to shoot and an apt applications to edit the footage, you can generate some profit. Like everything else in today's world, stock footage can also be bought and sold over the Internet. With numerous stock footage libraries mushrooming on the word wide web, it has become easier for people to submit their videos to such libraries and get them sold for a reasonable price.

Since these online libraries accept video submissions from mostly everyone, you can imagine the amount of videos already available. So, you must be a little cautious as you choose a theme for shooting. most people go with wildlife footage as it generates a supreme interest in them, not only because of the natural beauty it possesses but also the thrill and excitement it brings while shooting. If you go through the footage available on these online libraries, you will see them stuffed with wildlife videos.

So, if you shoot a wildlife video, you will be competing against countless other videos. Talking about competition, I will say that even those countless other videos may not get a chance because National Geographic has its own stock footage library. Living in a city that has a historical significance or efficient architecture can be beneficial here. You don't even have to invest too much in shooting a video of your city.

Even if you live in a place that's not known for architectural monuments or buildings, you can get the footage of the crowd rushing. Footage of crowds, ambulances streaming by or even traffic is high in demand. Next time you are stuck in a traffic, roll your camera and shoot the jam packed street instead of cursing. Another most powerful option would be world widely known festivals, parks and suburban homes. Moreover, you can visit multiple stock footage sites and check out the kind of videos they feature to get a fair idea of what sells the most.

due to better technology and rising competition, people mostly search for HD footage</A>. So make it a point to shoot a good quality video with high resolution. Once you have shot and edited your footage, you can upload it on an online library. Though, libraries accept all file formats, Mpeg4 is the most suitable one. You can either burn a DVD and send it to a library or upload it directly on the web portal.
